THE MISTLETOE.

Enough of It Growing in This Country for All Festal Purposes.

There is mistletoe growing in our own country quite good enough to answer all the festal purposes of the mistletoe descended from that which the old Druids in their white robes cut with a golden sickle just after the new of the moon, and distributed for charms against all evil to their believing tribes. It is not, indeed, the true and ancient mistletoe; but it takes a botanist and a good one to tell you why not; and it is quite as interesting in its appearance, with the long, olive-like leaves and the singular translucent berry with a gleam of green in its whiteness, something between a moonstone and a pale cat's-eye quartz in tint. It grows any where in the Virginia latitudes, abounds upon the mesquite in Texas, and is usually to be found in the Washington flower market through the Christmas holidays.

The plant is certainly beautiful and curious; but except for its parasitical origin and growth, which gave it a sort of a mystery to the unlearned and primitive mind, it is difficult to see why it ever attained such eminence as it had, although it is true that the Druids gave it veneration only when found growing on the oak, which was sacred to the sun -the Druidical worship and that of the old Persians having much in common; but it held with them, for whatever reason, an important part in the great rites of the winter solstice, corresponding to our Christmas festivities. One of the old northern myths makes the dart which killed the beautiful Balder out of the mistletoe, which alone of all nature had not been bound to do him no harm, possibly as showing that there is nothing in the universe without significance, and "with Him there is no great nor Nowadays the strange plant is found less often on the oak than on the apple tree, where it kills out whole orchards, being all but indestructfble itself, and living just as long as there is any sap in the tree it has chosen; in some regions it has, indeed, become more profitable to raise and sell than the apples would be. In England, and in the wild state, it is most often sown by the misselthrush; but it is raised artificially by crushing the berries on a hough, to which their glutinous matter adheres and where they generate; others make a slit with a penknife on the underside of a branch, so that it may not be observed by the birds, and there insert the seed, and something of a weird and mysterious character is seen in a species of intelligence manifested by it, since, in whatever direction the seed is pointed, the radical will turn toward the surface, and fasten itself in such manner as to draw the most nutrimentit can, and it has even been successfully grafted upon another miseltoe. That it should still have a part in our Christmas keeping is owing to the fact that we always have a tenderness to-ward the customs of our ancestors.— Harper's Bazar.

HE GOT HIS MONEY.

How a Kentuckian Identified Himself at a

City Bank. A story about being identified at a bank is related by the Chicago Times of a Kentuckian whose farm was adjacent to a river. There he raised fruit and vegetables and instead of sending them to market by the railroad or in his wagons he built a raft on which he loaded the produce and floated the whole crop down the stream to the big city. There he had no difficulty in disposing of the entire load at good prices and in payment he received a check for a handsome amount. A check was only so much worthless paper in the place where he lived, and so before going home the raw-boned Kentuckian entered a bank to have it cashed. He was dressed in a suit of brown jeans, his whiskers were unkempt and his general appearance belied his propagate. The appearance belied his prosperity. The cashler looked at him doubtfully. "You will have to be identified," he said. "Wall, I reckon not," replied the farmer. "That check air payable to me an' I mean to have the mean' I mean "That check air payants to have the money."

"But I don't know you. Who are you, rear eend o' that air check, an' as to whar I am from, why, I air from Bush bottom, up river."

"Well, how in thunder do you expect me to know if what you tell me is true. How did you get down here!" "Git here! Wall, now, I jest jumped onto a rainbow and slid here, mister. An' I tell you twas pretty quick traveling, but it ain't half so suiden as the slide you'll take into etarnity of you don't hand over that money mighty sudden."
